- this dancing light, this tiny voice filled them with something just short of giggles but twice as deep.
- "what is in our fire?"
- the girl asked, at last.
- "are you alive?
- ""as alive as every flame that licks the forest with its hot, tongue and awakens the valley with its burning howl!"
- screeched the voice, through the crackling.
- "that sounds scary."
- said the boy.
- "they're children.
- remember children carry the original light," another fiery voice called out, deeper and stronger than the first.
- "they are young, like you."
- the voice added.for a long time, there was no other sound but the snap and spit of the logs.
- no other light than the flame and embers they has seen on so many trips to the mountains.then, just as the boy and girl began
- spectacular fountains of colored light rose and swirled above the fire, which had become larger now.
- on every log, the yellow flame was separating into many more brilliant lights.
- swaying, leaping, swirling, their shapes becoming like dancers.the girl and boy looked at each other in delight.
- how was it that at this moment, on this mountain, in the deep of black night, that they were watching such wonder?
- "i can tell by your eyes we're the first you have seen," the lower voice sighed warmly from the fire.
- "the first!
- the first!
- let us show them, then, the glory of the fire fairies!"
- squealed the smaller voice.
- and the sky became a theater of exquisite light and color.the boy, who had sometimes feared the dark, exclaimed to his sister,
- the girl wondered aloud, where did these dancing lights come from and why were they here?
- "the original light."
- said the deeper voice, plainly.
- "you will lose it soon, my child, as all the people of flesh and bone do in time.
